OPINION*

ROTH, Circuit Judge:

When the appellant-employees (employees) were hired, they faced a choice: join a union and pay dues or decline to join and pay “fair share” fees.¹ At the time, it was lawful for unions to charge fair share fees to nonmembers. The employees, all of whom work for Lebanon County, chose to join Teamsters Union Local 429 (the Union). In 2018, however, the Supreme Court held in *Janus v. AFSCME*² that state laws authorizing unions to charge fair share fees violate the First Amendment. So after Janus, the employees faced a different choice: pay union dues or pay no fees.

The employees chose to resign from the Union. The Union stopped charging them dues. It also refunded to them the dues that had automatically been deducted after they resigned. Nevertheless, the employees sued.³ They sought a refund of the dues they had paid before they resigned from the Union. In their view, they should have had the choice

* This disposition is not an opinion of the full Court and, under I.O.P. 5.7, is not binding precedent.

¹ A fair share fee is a payment that nonmembers are required to make to the union, which typically is a percentage of union dues. See Janus v. Am. Fed’n of State, Cnty., & Mun. Emps., Council 31, 138 S. Ct. 2448, 2460 (2018). A “fair share” fee is the same as an “agency” fee.

³ Nevertheless, the Union continued to withhold money from Adams and Weaber through March 2019—after they filed this lawsuit.

to pay dues or pay nothing at all—even before Janus. Because they did not have that choice, they contend that their payment of union dues violated the First Amendment.

The employees also assert that Pennsylvania’s exclusive-representation law, making a union the exclusive bargaining agent for employees, violates the First Amendment.

The employees filed their complaint in February 2019. The complaint names as defendants the Union, the County of Lebanon, the Pennsylvania Attorney General, and members of Pennsylvania’s Labor Relations Board. The parties filed cross motions for summary judgment. The Magistrate Judge issued two Reports and Recommendations, recommending that the District Court grant summary judgment for the defendants. The District Court adopted the Magistrate Judge’s recommendations and dismissed the claims. The employees appealed.

I. Jurisdiction

The District Court had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. §§ 1331 and 1343. We have jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1291.

II. Standard of Review

Our review of an order granting a motion for summary judgment is plenary.⁴ Summary judgment is appropriate “if the movant shows that there is no genuine dispute as to any material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.”⁵ In considering the motions, we “review the record as a whole, draw all reasonable inferences in favor of the nonmoving party, and must not ‘weigh the evidence or make credibility determinations.’”⁶

III. Discussion

On the issue of refund of dues, we have recently held in LaSpina v. SEIU Pennsylvania State Council,⁷ that a former union member has “no standing to seek a refund of any portion of the union dues she made prior to Janus because she cannot tie the payment of those dues to the Union’s unconstitutional deduction of fair-share fees from nonmembers.”⁸ LaSpina involved a similar situation to the one we have here: an employee, in an exclusive representation employment situation, who joined the union rather than paying a fair share fee and who then, after Janus, resigned from the union and sued to get a refund of union dues. We dismissed the claim for refund in LaSpina and following LaSpina, we do the same here. The employees lack standing to seek a refund of union dues paid before they resigned the union.⁹ The employees’ claims for prospective injunctive and declaratory relief are moot because they have not shown their employers or the union will continue to assess union dues.¹⁰ To the extent Adams and Weaber still seek damages for union dues paid after they resigned the union, their claims are now moot because they have been reimbursed and, in any event, they fail to state a claim under the First Amendment.^{11, 12}

Turning to the claim that the Public Employee Relations Act (PERA), Pennsylvania’s exclusive representation law, violates the First Amendment, we hold that, consistent with every Court of Appeals to consider a post-Janus challenge to an exclusive-representation law, the law does not violate the First Amendment.¹³

The Supreme Court rejected a First Amendment challenge to an exclusive-representation law in 1984. In Minnesota State Board for Community Colleges v. Knight, a group of teachers challenged a Minnesota law that permitted the designation of an exclusive union representative for school employees.¹⁴ The Court explained that the law did not violate the teachers’ freedoms of speech or association.¹⁵ The state did not “restrain[] appellees’ freedom to speak on any education-related issue.”¹⁶ Nor did the law impermissibly infringe on “their freedom to associate or not to associate with whom they please.”¹⁷ And the teachers were “free to form whatever advocacy groups they like.”¹⁸

Recognizing that Knight presents a large obstacle, the employees try to tack around it. They argue that Knight was only about whether the employees could demand a forum with their employer. This case is different, they posit, because they object to the Union speaking on their behalf at all. The employees’ complaint is that the Union can allegedly “speak in their name.”¹⁹ Thus, they argue, Knight does not bar their constitutional claim.

This reading of Knight, however, is simply at odds with what it says. It is true that in Knight the teachers argued that the law violated the First Amendment because it made the union their exclusive representative. But the Court also considered whether the law violated the teachers’ First Amendment freedoms of speech or association. It held that it did not.

Knight forecloses the First Amendment challenge. Like the law in Knight, PERA allows for the designation of an exclusive representative. Like the law in Knight, it requires the public employer to negotiate with the exclusive representative on employment issues. The employees here, like the teachers in Knight, are free to express whatever ideas they wish, including through groups they create and including about the Union. Indeed, PERA protects their right to present certain grievances to their employer.²⁰ Also like the teachers, the employees are free to associate—or not—with the Union. Given these similarities, this law does not violate the First Amendment.

The employees' final argument is that Janus undercut Knight. Janus provides, however, that “[s]tates can keep their labor-relations systems exactly as they are.”²¹

Nothing in Janus undermines Knight or exclusive-representation laws.

IV. Conclusion

For the reasons stated above, we will affirm the District Court's orders granting summary judgment to the defendants.
